Bricker Graydon's Construction Law Fellowship

Make the break to a career in construction law

You cannot drop everything to be a full-time law student. However, your day job should be more than just a way to pay tuition. Lay the foundation for your legal career with the Bricker Graydon Construction Law Fellowship program. This program combines part-time study with full-time immersion in a real-world construction law department while at the same time making accommodations for exam schedules. For a Bricker Graydon Construction Law Fellow, every day presents new ways to apply and understand legal concepts. In the classroom and on the job, attorneys offer support and advice.

This prestigious fellowship is awarded to engineers and architects every year. Bricker Graydon Construction Law Fellows:

- Attend law school part-time through evening programs
- Work during their first year of law school as legal assistants in Bricker Graydon's construction law department at a compensation rate commensurate with junior positions at architectural and engineering firms
- Become eligible for a law clerk position after the first year
- Gain the opportunity to become a Bricker Graydon associate upon graduation

As new associates, former Fellows are ahead of their careers with:

- Four years of directly related, paid job experience
- A wealth of client contacts and professional relationships
- The ability to hit the ground running and work efficiently with the Bricker Graydon construction departments

The Firm is open to remote arrangements for Fellows, but flexibility to be on-site when needed is a plus.

Admission Requirements

Bricker Graydon awards Fellowships depending upon department needs and forecasts.

Successful applicants will have:

- A technical background in engineering, architecture, or construction management
- Field experience (preferred)

"There's a lot of communication and cohesion within the construction law department. My experience was a true apprenticeship support I needed to hit the ground running."
